Thus far, Lafayette has received two awards and a recognition in 2011. It was recognized by the Daily Beast for its environmentally conscious population characteristics including mass transit ridership and percentage of the population who recycle. The award from Indiana Main Street is also a “green” award. The City of Lafayette undertook the complete restoration of a vacant storefront next door to City Hall. The City relocated its Economic Development and Community Development departments to this building to not only put the building to reuse and bring it to LEED efficiency standards, but also to make room in City Hall for its growing police department. Area Development Magazine also recognized Lafayette because Nanshan America Advanced Aluminum has selected the city for its 100m aluminum extrusion facility, which is the first US investment made by the company.
